The practice of requiring Members and visitors to remove their head-dress or ‘remain uncovered’ is an ancient parliamentary practice adopted to allow the Speaker and other Members to be assured that those present were in fact Members and visitors were not people with malicious intent. It is a practice that was once part of this House’s Standing Orders and now is continued more as recognition of our parliamentary heritage and respect for the institution than for any real procedural purpose. Clearly in this day and age this House acknowledges the right of every citizen and every visitor to this House’s respect for their religious and cultural practices.
